Patient Advocates: Experience within the Podoconiosis Network

Fikre Hailekiros and Gail Davey
September 10th, 2020
Background: the need and the challenges

Like many other NTDs, podoconiosis is found in remote, rural settings, in communities far from the ‘seats of power’.

Affected people experience physical, social and psychological barriers to participation.

They are less likely to have had formal education and more likely to be food insecure that unaffected people in the same community.
How have patient advocates been identified and prepared? – the NaPAN perspective

- Understanding of the disease and its self-care practices
- Treatment adherence and progress gained
- Ability to articulate self-story related to the condition and socio-economic impact
- Passion to support other, particularly housebound cases
How have patient advocates been identified and prepared? – the NaPAN perspective

- Capacity building on communication skills and corporate business management
- Inclusion and participation in various community conversation sessions
- Equipping with the required infection prevention materials while giving care to housebound patients
- Providing messaging flyers and leaflets to use in community awareness-raising activities
How can patient advocate training be supported? – the Footwork perspective

Identify (and create!) opportunities to participate

Identify budget lines to support –

• Language training
• Communication skills training
• Travel for visa application
• Flights, visas, accommodation, subsistence and conference registration expenses for advocate and supporter
Footwork – support for patient advocates

Research funding budget lines
• Public and community engagement/involvement
• Dissemination
Specific fundraising
Unrestricted funds

Developing patient advocates is a long-term process

Break out group discussion (25 minutes)

- What are the lessons learned when it comes to participation of persons affected? (From the presentations, but also from other experiences we have made)

- What are the challenges/obstacles we face when it comes to increasing participation of persons affected? How can we address these challenges?

- What are the next/first steps? Thinking especially about NGOs who are starting to think about participation of persons affected? Which actions can be implemented?
